As a neutral, not-for-profit, GS1 works every day with members and partners to build a universal system for product identification and data sharing. They aim to make trusted product data accessible with a single scan - so that anyone, anywhere can make informed choices

Their challenges

- Value chain collaboration on sustainability data is crucial; tackling it in isolation creates major inefficiencies
- GS1, recognized for its global scale, neutrality, and decades of experience, has been asked by its members to play a role in resolving these inefficiencies, e.g., by driving harmonization across the value chain via common standards
- To accelerate and secure stakeholder support, GS1 needed a clear, compelling proposition explaining its role and value for its members in the sustainability space

What we achieved together

Defined a clear vision and compelling story for GS1's role in sustainability data exchange

Identified concrete starting points and shifts needed to turn the vision into action

Secured initial buy-in from leading consumer goods players across the full value chain

SparkOptimus

The Spark approach for real impact

- Customer-first: Started from open & honest interviews to uncover what matters to value chain players
- Pragmatic: Turned a complex, abstract topic into a clear, mobilizing story, clearly highlighting the ‘what’s in it for them’
- Action-oriented: Moved beyond the strategic story, and outlined the concrete shifts needed to deliver on the vision

“I strongly believe that sustainability ambitions can only be achieved through true collaboration across the value chain. That’s why it’s great to see that our work with GS1 contributes to making that collaboration a reality”
